War and Memory in Japan

The way Japan remembers World War II is sometimes radically at odds with the way it is remembered elsewhere. Pulitzer Prize-winner John W. Dower describes this phenomenon, assesses America's role in enabling it, and explains its implications for our understanding of the way nations construct their memories of war.

This presentation is part of the Rethinking East Asia Series sponsored by the Center for East Asian and Pacific Studies. Please consult www.eaps.uiuc.edu/center.html or call 333-7273 for more information on this occasional lecture series.
